

Intense pain doesn't deter star swimmer

Kaleb van der Merwe is already one of the real heroes of the South African Commonwealth team, without him even having swum one stroke.

Imagine being in so much pain that you have to be put on a drip in a hospital's intensive care unit. That is a reality for Van der Merwe.

And it does not just happen once in a while. In a lousy month, he could end up in hospital on a few occasions.

In spite of this, the Tuks swimmer has qualified to swim the 100m breaststroke and the 200m individual medley in the Paralympic S8-category at the Games.

Although Van der Merwe admits to being relatively inexperienced when it comes to international competitions, he is still optimistic about getting good results.

"If I can equal my best time of 1:43.29 in the breaststroke, there is a realistic chance of me qualifying for the finals.

"But the main goal, for now, is to gain as much experience as possible that will hopefully stand me to good stead in the build-up to the 2020 Paralympic Games in Tokyo," said Van der Merwe.

He holds six South African and two African records in his category.

His best time in the 200m individual medley is a time of 2:46.86.

Van der Merwe has always been passionate about participating in sport, as his family believes in the principle that a healthy body leads to a healthy mind.

At first he was an avid cricketer, athlete and soccer player. In his own words, although he was not that good, he did enjoy every moment being out on the sports field.

In 2009, Van der Merwe's life was changed irrevocably. He was involved in a serious motor accident. "Don't ask me what happened, because I cannot remember anything.

"My right arm and shoulder were so badly injured that I am paralysed. I have no feeling. I can move my fingers a bit, but that is pretty much it," he explained.

The medical term for his condition is brachial plexus.

A brachial plexus injury occurs when these nerves are stretched, compressed, or in the most severe cases, ripped apart or torn away from the spinal cord. According to his dad, Gerhard, there is no chance of any recovery.

It was his dad who suggested that he should take up swimming.

"I did, but I did not enjoy it at all and I quit. A few months later, I decided to give swimming another go. My dad arranged for a personal instructor at the gym."

He ended up matriculating at TuksSport High School, where he was and still is being coached by Rocco Meiring.

Kaleb van der Merwe performs in the swimming pool, despite constant pain due to his disability.

Photo: Reg Caldecott.

