

A justified contradiction

By Lené van Rensburg (LLB I)

The law creates diversity through uniformity.

It is the moral fibre that keeps a manifold of individuals in harmony.

It is the black and white that forms the basis of our colourful community, giving diverse individuals a right to equality.

It is the rigid rules that give freedom to the totality of our prevailing population,

a rigorous system that yields to self expression.

It is the stern set of rules that instil a sense of emancipation, humanities continuous shield against threats of oppression.

The law is a system that prohibits any form of transgression.

It is a powerful tool for persuasion, yet upon its application relies heavily on humanity and discretion.

Incapable of infiltration, it is the basic unit that forms a rainbow nation.

It's the fact, not the fiction-

The law in itself, a justified contradiction.
